Menu Ecological and Social Outcomes of Using Insects in Agriculture Thu, 12/01/2010 - 17:53 -- Sisyphus As a growing number of organic farmers in places such as Europe, Australia and elsewhere look for ways to boost productivity and income, the science and technology behind mass-rearing insects and feeding them on waste and other organic materials promises a good solution for many. But there is a deep paradox underlying all this research. Research is usually aimed at discovering ways to reduce labor and boost profits by turning one material into another, and by feeding those insects a diet of corn, apples or other food sources that will be purchased in order to be marketed. So, the practice is an interesting way to help solve some of the problems that create farming poverty, notably: How to raise enough income to pay the costs of cultivating crops, fertilizing, disease control and the diversified inputs and services to consumers that drive modern agriculture. How to reduce the environmental cost of food production. How to address the public relations problem of not producing food, but growing plants, at the same time as not harming the environment. All the research thus far on the environmental and economic values of rearing insects for food and other uses has so far been about controlling the insects, either by trapping them or killing them as soon as they start to consume food. Those who have pursued these areas of research have not considered their potential value for farmers. Research on this important problem is needed. There are four main issues that need to be addressed. The first issue concerns the ecological impact of rearing insects. Research on this subject needs to consider a few different facets. The most obvious is the trade-off between applying pesticides on crops and controlling
