Q: Rails 4, Sphinx and Sphinx-rtdocs I'm trying to build my first rails app, with sphinx as documentation. Using sphinx-rtdocs, I've created my docs dir : `~/rails_app/public/docs/sphinx/html/rails_app-data.rst` And by 'rake sphinx:setup', I get all my assets files with the docs dir as root in `~/rails_app/public/assets`. But I get the error 'Error: documentation for rails_app-data.rst not found'. How can I fix this? A: Just update your sphinx.conf config file in `config/sphinx.conf`. Set root option for your local docs to `~/rails_app/public/docs/sphinx/html/rails_app-data.rst` O: What would my burrow years look like? I am creating a world/setting where burrow-life is normal and a common(?) part of day-to-day life. I am trying to think about what a burrow-year would like to a person that lives in a burrow. Specifically I am thinking that each year would be nine months long. A month is from now becoming last month. I believe that I need to account for the increased rate of aging due to the harsh/thin food and lack of sleep. So which would be the best way of accounting for this: Reduce the duration of a year by seven months. Reduce the average level of health A: A year is not a fixed length. Instead of counting months in a year, count days, and reduce the length of a year by the length of a day. As a rough analogy, you could have the eggplant "year" of 428 days, where a month is an average of 30 days. After all, a month is only a month because the distance from the start of the calendar year to the first day of spring is 30 days. If you reduce the year to just a month, the month you have just completed would cover 12.2 hours. That's a good comparison to a day, because 12.2 hours is less than a day. As a guide, a human being can live just under four years, and

A group of young women have been fired from a position at London-based investment bank UBS over an alleged "sexist" work environment. One of the women who was sacked, has said that they had received "humiliating" sexual requests and were forced to work in "an office decorated with teddy bears." The women were employed as bank tellers in the new media division where one was the daughter of the firm's chief executive. UBS denied any wrongdoing, saying it had strict anti-discrimination policies. The women have been joined by the Royal College of Nursing, which has criticised the bank's tactics. Here is how the dispute unfolded. In the office The tellers were employed in a 36-strong group in the new media division at the bank in central London. They were based at UBS's new offices on the capital's Southbank, where they worked in cubicles, in a makeshift foyer and in the canteen. One of the tellers, who worked in the London office, told Sky News they were subject to what she called a "patronising, bullying environment." Her co-workers included a former fashion model who was in a relationship with a UBS executive and who the teller said received "constant requests for sex" from her boss. The teller claims he sexually propositioned her in a lift at work, despite the teller being in a long term relationship at the time. The person said when he pulled over on the floor of the lift she was "screaming so loud" she kept her co-workers up at night. The woman said she had a similar incident in the canteen when a colleague made "constant sexual remarks" and "tried to touch me". "I would have to ignore it and put up with it because I was in it for the career," she said. The other women in the group were not named in the allegations and it was not clear if they had also been investigated. The tellers told Sky News they were not allowed to change their shifts or leave the office without securing prior permission. They claimed they were not paid regular wages, and were not given updated contracts as some of them continued in their roles after a year. A senior banking source said that all female employees were subject to strict
