Having used Sibelius more than an hour a day for about 10 years, I have considered a full transfer. However, Id much rather stay with that version and just get the new updates - as long as they dont involve me having to go through the long arduous process of having to convince my clients that a new version is worth the effort. One of the great things about MuseScore is that the page numbers are saved with the score. Very convenient and you can have them update with the score itself if you make a change. However, Sibelius has a number of basic page formatting options. For example, it has a unique looking page numeration in which you can enter how many pages are on each stave. The number you enter is then automatically applied. 1. Page layout: Often called "page setup" and this determines how the notes are displayed and how you will see them. There are 3 pages, and they typically are arranged horizontally. MuseScore allows for page set-up on 3, 4, 5 or 6 different pages. I have yet to figure out if Sibelius supports this. The default page layout is 3 but you can also add additional pages to the layout. The default key settings are fairly good for me. However, if you can design your own keys, then you can use the ones in the MuseScore Library. Alternatively, you can use the one that we built for Sibelius. The advantage to making your own is that you can set any sort of keys that you want, and you can set them in pairs on each system to achieve very complex chords. Like several programs before it, Sibelius works by combining in one score a variety of separate files. Each of these files becomes its own part when it is imported into the main score. These parts can be edited independently and the combined music may be edited further to create a final version of the main score. Various features and functions of the program are included in the basic set of parts. Other parts, to the extent they are needed, can be created and added by the user.
